POSITION AND BACKGROUND

The patient with a rheumatic disease should never encounter a barrier when seeking an initial consultation or receiving ongoing care from a rheumatologist. Rheumatologists should have the option to be the principal care physician for patients with a rheumatic disease. The reasons for this are several and include:

1. Rheumatology, like other areas of medicine, has evolved into a highly complex specialty. Advances in diagnostics and therapeutics have occurred at an unprecedented rate over the last decade. It is the rheumatologist, and only the rheumatologist, who maintains expertise in this highly specialized area of medicine.

2. The current structure of residency programs in internal medicine and pediatrics generally fails to provide adequate education and experience in rheumatology. As a result, general practitioners do not have the opportunity to develop sophisticated skill sets comparable to those of rheumatologists. Consequently, care of rheumatic diseases provided by general practitioners could be suboptimal, inefficient and more costly.

3. Rheumatologists receive 3 years of training in general medicine or pediatrics after the completion of medical school. This training provides them with sufficient knowledge and education to address many of the non-rheumatic problems that develop in their patients.

4. Many of the patients treated by rheumatologists have single conditions. Duplicative care is unnecessary and adds to the cost of health care.

Patients want to be confident that they are receiving the best care from those with the most knowledge and experience. Payers want to be confident that precious health care dollars are being efficiently and effectively spent. Therefore, rheumatologists should serve as the principal care physician for patients with rheumatic diseases.
